When Static Electricity Be Deadly Than Dynamite

Actual Photograph of an iron-wire dynamite in the terrible force of a blast. (The dynamite is in the foreground.)

When static electricity strikes a building, it can be deadly. In fact, it can be more deadly than dynamite. This is because static electricity can build up a huge charge, and when it discharges, it can create a massive spark. This spark can ignite any flammable material, including dynamite. In fact, static electricity has been known to cause explosions in mines, factories, and even homes. So, it's important to be aware of the dangers of static electricity and to take steps to prevent it from building up.

Static electricity is a form of energy that is created by the friction of two different materials. When two materials are rubbed together, electrons are transferred from one material to the other. This creates a positive charge on one material and a negative charge on the other. When the two materials are separated, the charges are attracted to each other, creating a static electric force. This force can be strong enough to cause a spark, which can ignite any flammable material.

A CARD INDEX

A CHARGED WARD compared to a card index. The card index is a device that is used to store and retrieve information. It consists of a series of cards, each with a unique number and a set of data. The cards are arranged in a specific order, and the information can be retrieved by looking up the card number. This is a very efficient way of storing and retrieving information, and it is used in many different applications, including libraries, businesses, and government agencies.

Target creature is Teleported to the target zone. X = 3 mana per zone moved away from its current zone. You must pay at least 3 mana even if target is teleported into the same zone. This does not count as a move action for the creature.

Teleportation is as simple as folding a piece of paper for those whose canvas is the fabric of space.
